i've been trying to think of a way to explain the pain after a few bad days and also working on a dairy farm at the time.

You're sitting in the paddock beside an electric fence.

Sometimes a cold breeze blows and the fence touches your face.

The farmer has control of how strong the electric current is that zaps your face.

Sometimes the breeze blows so hard that the fence touches your face and stays there until the wind dies down and you get relief.

If you're lucky, the farmer may go on a holiday and turn the fence off, giving you a false sense of hope.

You can never move away from the fence and you know exactly what the farmer and the weather are going to do... all you can do is brace yourself and hope that the farmer dies soon and the fence turned off.
